Incense must be cast upon the fire before its odours are set free. Wheat must be crushed before it becomes bread. The sweetest joys of life are the fruits of sorrow, tribulation, and hard toil. This is what my God Almighty taught me in my adult years and it is to that Omniscient Father that this work belongs. He made my moving fingers write and my having writ, He made me move on. My mother Late Mrs. C. V. Janaki Ammal, who left this world at a young age when I was nine, has passed on to me the ability to write with clear thinking, and the script overflows spontaneously whenever I take up my pen. My beloved father, Late Sri. Ananthasiva Iyer of Kizhakke Madom, Moncompu, fortunately passed on to me along with his love, compassion and empathy, qualities like tenacity and a stubborn determination to finish my work and reach the goal, whatever be the obstacle that intervened in between. My heart swells with pride and more with humility when I express my gratitude to those dear departed souls for being the physical agents to bring me into this world of ideas and letters.

My only son Late Ananth Mathew and my husband Late T. E. Mathew (Moti) nursed a dream in their hearts which was my acquiring a doctorate on a not much talked about genre. I give all glory to the purity and sincerity of their hearts for encouraging me and anticipating eagerly the time when this thesis would see the light of day. Watching from their heavenly abode, they must be thanking the Lord too. I even wishfully imagine that they are hovering protectively over me spiritually, even while I write this. In the course of writing this study, I have incurred debts both large and small that cannot be repaid.

Dr. Ayyappa Paniker, whose ward I boldly call myself since my teens, has been the human arranger for me to take up a work on a person none less than Sri. Shashi Tharoor. I recollect that several years ago, though Sri. Tharoor, a very senior official even at that time in the most important organization of the world, had only two famous and internationally appreciated books to his credit, my Mahaguru with his visionary powers had prophetically seen the greatness and potential of this author and advised me to read all his works and articles, and see India through the vision of Tharoor with Tharoor's eyes. Paniker Sir proved himself a rich source of information about popular culture and provided needed encouragement especially in the early stages of my work. The result was that every other topic paled into insignificance for me. I mentally prostrate at the feet of Paniker Sir for morally and spiritually guiding me in the right way. Though he cannot see my work with human eyes now, I seek his blessings while I present this dissertation.

I am deeply indebted to Dr. C. J. Davees, Reader, Research Centre, Department of English, St. Thomas' College, Thrissur, Kerala, for being my guide and helping me in many ways to submit this dissertation. I am grateful to him for guiding me to choose this topic. Whenever my ardour failed due to lack of research material on a very recent topic and my spirits blew down to zero level, Dr. Davees, came as a life-saver, pulled me out of disillusionment and encouraged me to depend not only on reference material which cannot be voluminous for a recent coinage, but also on my own capacity to justify, even introduce a topic which he was sure will be given avid acceptance by an enthusiastic academic milieu. To Dr. Davees who guided me through the doctoral study and who read earlier drafts of my thesis, I owe a tremendous and permanent debt. Though chronologically old enough to be my son, I have no adequate words that will suffice to acknowledge even a part of the gratitude towards my guide, who waited patiently for my late updates and delays caused by debilities like chronic arthritis. But for his words of encouragement, my self-esteem lowered by illness and tragedies might have made me give up this precious attempt. I pray to God that this hardworking young man will harvest many more academic accolades in his productive life to come.

My daughter Dr. (Mrs.) Anjana Pradeep and son-in-law Pradeep Chandrasekharan were with me heart and soul to finish this work in a befitting way. But for their tenacious follow-up from afar, I might have, due to personal mishaps and attacks of pneumonia and meningitis, given up the completion of the work. Even my grandchildren Praarthana and Pratheeksha, tiny tots that they are, helped me by telling me to write fast whatever it was I was writing because, "God wanted it so." My happy thanks to them too, for trying quite unsuccessfully at times not to "disturb" me while I wrote!

Sri. Sreedharan Nair of Sasthamangalam, Thiruvananthapuram, a scholar himself, has influenced me while I was still at the topic selection stage, by saying that every research-scholar should think of what he / she has to contribute to society, to humanity in toto, with a research work. Getting a doctorate should not be end-oriented but community-oriented. I etched his words with golden letters in the inner walls of my mind, and that has also helped me to hit upon this vast and novel area which has contemporary value and futuristic significance as well. I am deeply indebted to him for planting the seeds of the principles behind research work, which, considering their value, I am imparting to the coming generation and rank of research scholars.

Mr. Ambujakshan, my young friend from abroad played a vital role during the final revision of this work. Though we were geographically far from each other, he played a significant role in motivating me.

I place on record my gratitude to the faculty of the Department of English and the Librarians of St. Thomas' College for all the co-operation and encouragement I received during the tenure of my research.

Several noteworthy litterateurs and academicians merit thanks from my humble self for the help, advice and encouragement they have given me, the first and foremost of them being Dr. Maya Dutt of the Institute of English, Thiruvananthapuram. She in her personal capacity as a family friend has given me a lot of tips regarding research methodology for which I am eternally grateful. Dr. V. Syamala, Thiruvananthapuram; Dr. Anita Devasia, Ernakulam; and Dr. Manju Skandanathan, Chennai, deserve my thanks for their valuable suggestions.

I am grateful to Vallaths Total English Solutions, Thiruvananthapuram, for helping me get this work ready. All my friends, relatives and well-wishers come into the umbrella under which I seek God's blessings and protection for helping, understanding and encouraging me, each in his/her own way to complete this thesis. If hereby I have failed to mention anyone who has helped me complete this, I hope and pray they will understand that it is a sin of omission rather than a sin of commission.

I give my devoted thanks to the Management and Director Board of the Madhavan Nayar Foundation for their encouragement and support. To all these and to those not specifically mentioned here, I give my sincere thanks.

Lastly because I feel it appropriate to do so, I thank Sri. Shashi Tharoor for having created works not only for the century but for the millennium humanity, works of such high-brow quality, touching the heart as well as the head equally, that made me possible not only to admire him as a writer, but also to absorb his views in like blotting paper, thus elevating my thinking process to a great extent. With hopeful retentiveness and recapitulation, I shall be able to pass on in the coming years, his ideas, and transmit his charisma to the youth of our country. But for his personal interest shown in my attempt and the rich compliments he gave me on my perseverance, this work would have been poorer. The faults if any are entirely my own responsibility.

Before you start leafing through my work, please allow me to once again give all glory to the Lord Almighty, the Absolute, who has been my best Friend, Nurse, Guide and Guardian, the Divine Companion who walks and works with me, understands my ups and downs, forgives me in my follies and helps me glorify His name always.
